Kia ora

As a car-less (by choice) city dweller I support any plan for future development and growth that encourages and makes it possible for people to change their car-dependency and live a productive, well-connected life.

Buildings, streets, roads, parks etc will be there for decades, and how well they're done will profoundly limit (or enable) the people who live there. "Behaviour change" can't do anything meaningful when the entire landscape is pushing against it.
